1.Once there was a rich merchant. He traded in cotton. He had a flourishing business. Several people worked in his godowns. Once he had to go to Mumbai in connection with his business. He was away from home for about a week. In his absence, several bales of cotton were stolen from his godowns. The merchant reported the matter to the police. An enquiry was made, and many people were interrogated. But the thieves could not be traced.

2. One day the merchant had a talk about the whole affair with an intimate friend. The friend said, "It is quite easy to identify the thieves. Call people for a feast and I shall pick out the thieves." So, many people were invited to a feast. When the feast was going on, the merchant's friend stood up and said, "It is very kind of you, gentlemen, to have responded to the invitation. It is always a pleasure to sit and dine together." He cast a searching glance over all the people and said that even the thieves who stole the bales of cotton were present there. These thieves were fools as cotton was still sticking to their beards. The foolish thieves raised their hands to their beards to see if cotton was still sticking there. No sooner did they do it than they were caught. They were handed over to the police. They confessed their guilt and returned the bales of cotton quite intact.
